Electric vehicles are currently intensely discussed as most promising solutions to decrease CO₂ emissions of road transport. Electric vehicles possess certain features, which are highly relevant from the human factors perspective. Limited range, electricity, low noise emissions and regenerative braking pose new challenges for the drivers. We report findings from German field studies on the user interaction with electric vehicles. Implications for the design of the human machine interface as well as the potential of driver assistance systems are discussed.